Text 1: The Wish

1 Mary opened the pantry door. It was just as she'd thought. Only half a loaf of bread – nothing else at all. With a sigh, she began to slice it for supper.

The three of them sat round the rough wooden table – Mary, her husband Ben, and Grandmother. Grandmother reached out a papery hand to feel the food on her plate.

2 “Dry bread again, Mary?” she croaked. “I do wish we could have a juicy beef and onion pie or a fat roast chicken. I may not be able to see – what a curse it is to be blind! – but at least I can enjoy my food.”

“I’m sorry,” said Mary. “But you know that our crop of wheat has failed, and we have no money for food. Don’t make things worse by complaining.”

2 Why does Grandmother complain?

3 She put the rest of her bread on Grandmother's plate and hurried out of the room so that Ben would not see her crying. She went into the tiny bedroom and lay down on the bed, looking through her tears at the little carved crib in the corner. If only she had a baby! Nothing else would matter then.

4 The next morning, Ben picked up his hunting gun and strode out into the forest. He'd had enough of this – an empty stomach and the two women quarrelling all the time. He'd shoot a rabbit for tonight's supper, and maybe the good food would cheer them all up.

5 All day, he searched. But he found nothing, not even a tiny pigeon, and by nightfall he was cold, hungry – and cross.

He put his hunting gun on his shoulder and began to make his way home. But as he stepped out of the forest, something very peculiar happened.

6 The first thing he saw was a patch of soft white light, glowing against the deep blue of the sky. And from it, a strange creature danced up to him on delicate hooves, tossing its head to show off the long pointed horn which grew from its forehead.

7 Ben had read about unicorns in books, of course. And this one was beautiful! But his family was hungry, and he was in a desperate situation. He raised his gun. He stared into the unicorn's large violet eyes...

... No. It was impossible to shoot.

And then the unicorn spoke.

8 "Thank you for sparing my life. I am grateful. I will reward you with a gift – the gift of one wish!"

With that, it turned and galloped away with a whisk of its silky white tail.

A wish! He could wish for a fortune in gold!

But he'd better talk to Mary and Grandmother before he made a decision.

8 How does the unicorn reward Ben?

9 “I haven’t seen your face for a long time! Surely, you will use your one wish to give me back my sight?” Grandmother pleaded.

“No, Grandmother,” said Ben. “If we don’t eat a good meal soon, we will all die – blind or not! I must wish for gold – and then at least we will be able to buy food. Don’t you agree, Mary? Wouldn’t you like to be able to fill the pantry?”

“I would,” replied Mary sadly. “But there is something that is even more important to me – please, husband, won’t you wish for a dear little baby?”

10 Ben stood under the stars thinking. What should he wish for? The sun was rising when he finally made up his mind and went back into the house.

Mary was still in bed. Ben called Grandmother, asking her to join them.

Mary wants _____

Ben wants _____

11 “I wish... for Grandmother to be looking at our new baby, asleep in a crib made of pure gold!”

A soft white light began to fill the dark corner of the bedroom where Mary kept the wooden crib. And as the light faded away, Ben and Mary saw a gleaming gold one – with a smiling pink-cheeked baby inside it!

“I can see it too!” cried Grandmother.

12 From that day, everything changed. Ben and Mary sold the gold crib so that they would always have enough to eat, and they loved their new baby. Now that she could see, Grandmother was in a better temper. All because of a wish wisely used.

If you could have one wish – what would you wish for?

1 Long, long ago in a land far away, past the distant mountains, lived a king called Melancholia. He lived in a palace made of gold and silver. The rooms were filled with precious gifts that his people had brought from far and wide – rubies, pearls, velvets and silks.

The gardens of his palace were famous for their special plants, dancing fountains and peaceful woods.

2 Melancholia had an adoring wife and three beautiful daughters who cared for him deeply.

3 But despite all of these riches, beauty and love, Melancholia was not happy. He could not lift the sadness that filled his soul. 'Something, something is missing,' he sighed to himself as he wandered in the palace gardens. 'If only I knew what it was...'

4 Now, one day, Melancholia was walking in the deep woods of his palace. The sunlight was streaming through the knobbly branches of the tree. A thick frost illuminated everything with white sparkly ice.

5 Melancholia heaved a heavy sigh as he glanced at all the beauty around him. Suddenly, his eye caught sight of a beautiful, glistening red and gold creature blocking the path ahead. He blinked and looked again. There in front of him was an amazing...
